There is one question constantly coming up and never receiving fitting treatment. is hard to home her for a picture now. It is the question of imputability in disasters. The moral culpability of the person or body, to whom the disaster should be ascribed, is debated on, Everything points to the criminal neglect of this or Princess Delgercukt is "disclosing" in great that particular person as the cause of the casualty, and then, through a sort of Delgorouki's line. DOES THIS END IT?

When the Grand Jury refused to indict the cloakmakers for combining aga nat their working people to the workers' serious detriment dol' this settle that momentous question once and for all?

With the precedent of the decision in the Landgraf case and the parity between that and this of the employers of th cloakmakers before their eyes, is not this decision of the Grand Jury an outrage on the equality of the law?

Judge Martine seemed to think so and to his credit. He touched the key note when he declared that "it is a most dangerous precedent to let the workingmen know there is one law for the rich and another law for the poor."

If there is anything that can justify revolt on the part of the workingmen it is the clear perception that the laws are flagrantly maladministered to their serious loss. Law is worse than anarchy if it be not wise, impartial law. Such a decision of the Grand Jury is a scandal. It is a double shame if it should endure.
